By Marc Shapiro

With the onset of tornado season and other hazardous weather events, U.S. Communities, NLC’s government purchasing cooperative, can provide timely and affordable products and solutions to help cities “weather the storm” and assist in recovery from the aftermath.

Through competitively bid contracts with lead public agencies, U.S. Communities offers thousands of products and solutions from more than 30 suppliers offering their best government pricing.

“When it comes to weather related events, I encourage cities to look to U.S. Communities for a wide range of products and solutions from national companies to help with emergency preparedness and response,” said NLC Executive Director Clarence E. Anthony.

with any response hazard.

The Home Depot and HD Supplies Facility Maintenance provide supplies and assistance to prepare for and recover from any emergency and assist in coordinating with other organizations such as the American Red Cross to keep needed supplies moving into the affected areas.

Other U.S. Communities supply partners provide roofing supplies and services, heavy equipment rental, electrical supplies, materials for command centers, first aid equipment, portable lighting, clean up supplies and more.

Sponsored by NLC and four other national associations, along with 29 state municipal leagues, U.S, Communities reduces the cost of goods and services by aggregating the purchasing power of public agencies nationwide. Today more than 55,000 registered agencies, education institutions and nonprofits utilize U.S. Communities contracts to procure more than 1.4 billion dollars in products and services annually.

U.S. Communities has no minimum purchase requirements and meets all state procurement requirements through competitively bid contracts by a lead public agency. Registration for U.S. Communities is fast, easy and free.

THE MUNICIPAL REPORTER, May, 2014
Runway Pavement “Abraded” at Roswell International Air Center
Skidabrader treatment enhances pavement surface texture to meet FAA friction level standards.
By Jennifer Brady, Roswell International Air Center Manager

Originally operated as the Roswell Army Air Field during World War II, and as Walker Air Force Base during the Cold War, the Roswell International Air Center (RIAC) has evolved into a premier facility for a wide variety of commercial, corporate, general aviation and military aviation activities. Jennifer Brady, the Air Center Manager, is keenly focused on maintaining a vast area of concrete surfaces that have seen decades of heavy use. Most recently, friction testing results indicated the concrete keel section of the 13,000 foot-long primary runway had become polished smooth - so smooth that friction levels were well below minimum acceptable levels. This condition left the airport needing to provide a runway surface that met the FAA’s minimum friction levels while simultaneously providing a smooth enough un-grooved runway for aircraft certification testing regularly conducted by Boeing, Gulfstream, Learjet/Bombardier and Cessna aircraft companies.

Brady orchestrated consultation and coordination among the city, airport management, the FAA, NASA, New Mexico DOT, Armstrong Consultants, Inc. and the various aircraft manufacturers to identify and evaluate potential solutions. Various friction treatment methods were discussed, including simple rubber removal, hydro-blasting and shot-blasting. Ultimately, Skidabrader surface texturing was selected as the preferred method for the surface treatment. Rather than using cutting blades, the Skidabrader with its 6 Ft wide productive pass, propels steel shot at the pavement to create surface texture. The velocity of the abrasive, and/or the varying of the travel speed determined the desired texture. It separates the steel abrasive from the pavement debris, reuses the suitable media and sends the fine powdery residue to a truck mounted vacuum hopper for off-site disposal.

The City provided pavement remarking in-house and each of the aircraft testing companies contributed towards the project, but the available funding was still below the funding needed for the project. Jane Lucero and the New Mexico DOT Aviation Division (NMAD) stepped in with a discretionary aviation grant providing the balance of the funds needed to complete the project.

The project commenced in July, 2013 with the oversight by Kevin Sykes, Air Center Superintendent. After adjusting the Skidabrader machinery to provide the desired effect, the work started on the 13,000-foot by 100-foot concrete keel section over two evenings while the runway was closed. Hi-Lite Marking provided on-site friction testing throughout the project reporting real-time results as the treatment was applied.

Following the Skidabrader treatment, the entire runway was found to be above the required Maintenance Planning Level, meeting FAA runway friction level standards, while at the same time providing a suitable, un-grooved runway for aircraft certification testing.

The efforts, ideas, and expertise of the entire project team resulted in a cost effective solution that met FAA standards, required minimum runway down-time, and provided a precise level of surface texturing to accommodate aircraft testing activities...a win-win-win for everyone.
